The struggles at SF State College ended Tuesday just as it began, with 180 students still on the campus. Win or lose is still a matter of dispute.

Students have been on strike for more than a week, with 9:30 to 5:30 classes and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The strike began when the students decided to demand more money for their education. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

Professor Juan Martinez, like most other faculty members, finds the strike frustrating. "I have been on strike for a while now," he said. "I think it's important that we keep the issues in perspective."

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.

The strike has been ongoing for more than a week, with the administration offering to increase student fees by 10%. The students have rejected the offer and continue to demand more money for their education.

The strike has impacted the campus, with most classes canceled and extra-curricular activities organized by the South Campus Association. The administration has offered to increase student fees by 10%, which the students have rejected.
S.F. STATE AS BATONS BEAT BRAINS

A police mill to ended the eightday crisis at SF State Tuesday afternoon. The demonstration was called after a year of fighting between students and administration. The demonstration took place on campus Wednesday and Thursday.

Students on the campus staged a sit-in against the administration, which they accused of breaking promises made during negotiations. The sit-in turned into a full-scale protest against state funding for the university.

The students, who had been on strike for eight days, then decided to call a general strike. They won their five demands: (1) release of all students arrested during the sit-in; (2) removal of all campus police; (3) the resignation of the university president; (4) the appointment of a new president; and (5) the establishment of a student union.

The sit-in lasted for four days, during which time the police used tear gas, rubber bullets, and clubs to disperse the students. The students, however, refused to give up and continued their struggle.

The police mill to ended the crisis with the help of the National Guard and the FBI. The students were evacuated from the campus and continued their struggle.

The students gained some of their demands, including the release of all students arrested during the sit-in, the removal of all campus police, and the appointment of a new president. However, the students were not satisfied with the outcome and continue to fight for their rights.

STANFORD STUDENTS SECRET

By L.F. Military Editor

"If we don't take the movement..."

If we don't take the movement..."

Many of our "cooperators" were members of the students' Red Guard, study-action groups. These units are organized in small groups of no more than a dozen. They do not operate in secret.

A special report on the activity of the group led to the discovery of what was going on. The group was found to be a network of cells operating independently. The students were operating under the guise of studying American history.

The groups are totally separate. They do not coordinate. Some of the leaders know each other, and a loose command structure is maintained. The groups are a sort of "virtual" organization that can attack the power structure at points of opportunity and move back into the obscurity of the middle-class milieu.

Members of the Red Guard have organized those groups in addition to the other projects they undertake. There are apparently some other action groups operating independently. There is no real coordination between the groups, and those who are aware of their activities are not sure if they are underground or simply doing different things.

Dissenting voices in the Red Guard unit with the initials of this organization, the "Dissenters'" group, are often referred to by some as "communist" or "socialists," but they are not willing to be labeled as such.

The implications of the movement for the student and society at large are not yet clear. The movement is not yet a "fascist" movement, but it is not a "socialist" movement either. It is a movement of people who are tired of the status quo and are willing to take action to change it.

By Paul Klemay

David Victor Harris testified in the defense of his case at SF State on Thursday. The case involved the violation of his American rights by the police.

"I am here as you are, He as you are."

The police mill to ended the crisis with the help of the National Guard and the FBI. The students were evacuated from the campus and continued their struggle.

In defiance of the emergency proclamation the students marched on the administration building and arrested the mayor. The students were then released, but the mayor was arrested and placed in jail.

The stock market was closed, and all business was stopped. The city was in a state of emergency, and the police were on high alert.

Harris testified against the police and the administration. He said that the police were using excessive force and that the administration was covering up the violation of his American rights.

"I am here as you are, He as you are."

The police mill to ended the crisis with the help of the National Guard and the FBI. The students were evacuated from the campus and continued their struggle.